Yes, without a doubt. The group discussion tests whether a candidate can discuss a topic with other students they do not know. Some students are very shy or may not know how to interact with other candidates, but that may not necessarily mean they're bad at English. It wouldn't be fair if a student got a bad score because of their timid personality. They may be able to get much higher marks for an individual presentation.

Certainly, in terms of fitness requirements. A man's body is different to a woman's, so the requirements should be different. If they were the same, there might be fewer women on the police force. This would be bad, as there are some things that can only be done by female officers, such as carrying out a body search on another woman. There would be a lot of complaints if a man were to perform that.
